Hospital doctor's 45 years of service

On Thursday 26th August a doctor will retire after working at Wrexham Maelor Hospital for 45 years.

Dr Douglas Jones first worked in what was then the Maelor General Hospital in 1965 initially as a registrar in obstetrics and gynaecology and then later as Associate Specialist in obstetrics and gynaecology while also working as a GP at the Plas y Bryn surgery in Wrexham.

He had a specialist interest in ultrasound and, with Consultant Obstetrician Mr Joe Hamlett, led the introduction of the then new technology to Wrexham. Dr Jones retired as a GP in 2000, but continued his Hospital work for a further ten years.

Barbara Jones, Superintendent Radiographer, Ultrasound, said:

"Dr Jones has been central to the obstetric and gynaecological ultrasound service in Wrexham for the past 40 years. As well as ultrasound he had a particular interest in female infertility and, along with the late Mr Joe Hamlett, was instrumental in setting up a service to provide help and treatment for infertile couples in the Wrexham area.

"He also played a key role in the training of over 15 sonographers in the last 30 years, most of whom are still working in the area .His knowledge and expertise have been invaluable to patients and staff over the years and he will be missed by colleagues and patients."
